

It takes most hospitals
two days to evaluate chest pain.
That's enough to give some people a heart attack.

Chest pain is a frightening thing. And, inconveniently, a symptom of a long list of problems ranging from the extremely serious to the chili dog you ate last night. Until recently, though, a complete chest pain evaluation would take most hospitals two days to schedule all the necessary tests, have them interpreted, then get back to you. And two days is a long time to wait for the phone to ring when your heart could be involved.

At Halifax Health Medical Center we've got a better way. We opened up our new Chest Pain Center with a specific mission – complete chest pain evaluation in less than one day. To make it happen, we changed procedures, staffing, equipment and the physical location of everything involved.

Now it's a reality. Reducing the time to find out it was nothing more than last night's meal (which it frequently is). And also reducing the time to treatment if it's something more serious. The new Chest Pain Center at Halifax Health. Call 877.8.HALIFAX.

HALIFAX HEALTH

Breaking ground.

halifaxhealth.org